Excerpt: . . . in the exact species, occurs in some of the marly bogs on the coast of the Gasp6 Peninsula, where there is a remarkable mingling of marl-swamp types with the characteristic plants of sphagnum bogs and even of brackish or saline shores. Whether in these marshes there is a rare combination of calcareous, saline, and peat-bog conditions is a matter which awaits further study. From Crystal we returned to Pembroke, spending our last week there in collecting the fruiting Blackberries and Thorns and in closing off the summers work. On the way back to Boston we were tempted by the extensive outcrops of limestone in the neighborhood of Rockland to visit that city of lime-quarries with the hope of finding interesting coastal plants. In this, however, we were not wholly satisfied, for the rock seemed very hard and the soil sterile as compared with the softer limestones and limy slates and the extremely fertile soil we had just seen in Aroostook County. Being somewhat disappointed by the comparative sterility of the Rockland region we cast about for something better and decided to spend our last half-day of field-work in Maine in the neighborhood of Bath, the famous ship-building town. We knew that in West Bath Miss Furbish had a station (one of very few in New England) for Rosa acicularis Lindl. , var. Bourgeauiana Crepin, and that not far from Bath, by Winnegance Creek, was the only station in Maine (also discovered by Miss Furbish) for...
